Sternberg (1985) proposes an alternative theory of intelligence, which serves to offer the possibility of integrating different aspects of intelligence; the Triassic theory that there are there separate sub-theories of intelligence. One is the contextual intelligence; in which intelligence is directed towards purposive activity in the real world. The contacts and reasons shape the kinds of acts which we perform. The second is the experiential intelligence which is all about how someone’s own past experience influences how they go about a given task. We develop how fundamental skills in this regard. This is the the ability to deal with situational demands and the ability to automatism information processing. The last theory in the model is related to componential intelligence. This type of intelligence is related to cognitive mechanisms and has three types of cognitive components; met components, performance components and knowledge acquisition components. Sternberg’s model usually spells out the type of test items to be included in an intelligence test.
